12 When pollen grains in water are viewed through a microscope, they are seen to be in continuous, rapid, random motion.

What causes a pollen grain to move in this way?

A convection currents in the water

B bombardment by a single molecule of water

C uneven bombardment on different sides by water molecules

D collision with another pollen grain